

Every year almost 60.000 books are published in Italy. Whether in print or by internet, the number is constantly growing . Many publishers are in fact printers. Sometimes even prestigious publishers ask sponsors or authors for money before they print, if the calculated readership is insufficient. What if, at a certain point, there should be more writers than readers?

Easy irony. Overabundance also means a growing circulation of ideas, art, literature, scholarship. But hidden treasures might be lost in this constant flux. Everything cannot be settled in front of a computer. Therefore selection is essential, but it has to be reliable, based on expertise and independence, devoid of any form of bias or conflict of interest.

It is what “L’Indice dei libri del mese”, the Italian review of books, has been doing for 33 years and will go on doing, with an ever growing attention – obviously! – to what goes on and is directly published on line. But the added value of “L’Indice” is its capacity of fishing the valuable (and happy) few from the maelstrom. Its editors, staff and advisors every month select approximately 100 books – one every six, published in a year in Italy – that are worth being reviewed, discussed or signaled to an equally competent readership that cannot keep track of every angle of Italian arts and sciences.

This readership is constantly growing abroad. Italian is not a universally used language, but Italian culture is. In every country there are people who read Italian, but many more want to be informed on what has been and still is performed and produced by Italian culture. When asked why “L’Indice” was not on display, the librarian of one of the major libraries in the world answered: “We must make a second subscription, because we use it behind the stacks, to select the Italian books we are going to buy.”

This is to suggest that you also do so, assuming that you already have pocketed your first one. If not, by all means do so. Meanwhile visit us at www.lindiceonline.com.
